An analysis of voluntary, pressured and imposed exercises in the management of back pain: a cluster RCT. The study aimed to compare the effects of various forms of therapeutic exercise on the management of low back pain. Six hundred and twenty four patients were randomly allocated to one of four groups: 'voluntary' (12 sessions), 'forced' (12 sessions), 'imperative' (12 sessions) or 'no exercise' (control). At three, six and 12 months after the initial treatment, all patients were followed up by postal questionnaire. In a logistic regression analysis, the three trial groups were not significantly different in terms of their self-perceived health status after one year, but were significantly different from the control group in terms of pain intensity and the use of medication. The 'imperative' exercise group reported significantly lower pain intensity than the control group at one year, and the 'forced' exercise group reported significantly lower pain intensity than the control group at three months. The per protocol analysis showed that the 'imperative' exercise group were significantly more likely than the control group to report being pain-free and not taking medication at one year. This study found no differences in short-term health-related quality of life between the exercise groups, but differences in pain intensity and the use of medication. Overall, patients allocated to the 'imperative' exercise group were least likely to be pain-free and not using medication. This study highlights the importance of con
